

S

THE GOSS
AMY COOPER

INSIDE
PARTY PARADE
Night in white, cuppas for a cause, offline shopping
Pages 22, 23

Hot fuzz: (left) Aaron Glenane sporting furious fuzz for Drift; (below) bald and beautiful.

That's mo business

Ladies, which do you like best: rising star Aaron Glenane with facial furniture, or without the fuzz?

Funnily enough, when the actor grew thick sideburns and matching mo for his breakthrough leading role as Sam Worthington's mate in 1970s surf blockbuster Drift, his girlfriend preferred the fur.

Now the film's wrapped and screens from May 2, Glenane's extra hair is gone — and so is the girlfriend.

"Maybe that's why," the 26-year-old muses, speaking to S from his Sydney home. "I kept it all for a week, but I felt like I was still my character, so it had to go."

Drift follows a group of young Australian blokes — Worthington, Twilight's Xavier Samuel and Myles Pollard — who kick-start the global surfing industry. Glenane plays Gus, a bloke with a limp from childhood polio. "It doesn't go that well for him," Glenane says.

In real life, though, things are going very well, with Drift tipped as a hit and Glenane left with fond memories of filming "surrounded by great guys".

This wasn't the plan. From an early age, Glenane was hell-bent on being a basketball player like his hero, Michael Jordan. But he stopped growing.

"I'm about 179 centimetres," Glenane says. "That's not enough."

After failed flirtations with other sports, including running and even table tennis, Glenane was encouraged by his mum to take drama lessons.

Glenane quickly shone, scored a place in Dein Perry's Tap Dog troupe, TV roles followed and now he's made the big time — but not in sport.

"I wouldn't have picked it," he said. "But mum was right."

He's cute, he's successful and, astonishingly in Sydney, he's still "definitely single". But maybe this is why: "I still have a big poster of Michael Jordan on my bedroom wall," he said. "He's my idol! But I'm 26 and I guess maybe he needs to come down now."

MORSELS

Squeaky-clean teen TV is just a distant memory for Aussie actor Christian Antidormi, who started out on Disney's As the Bell Rings. The 20-year-old Sydney-born star of Spartacus: War of the Damned has become one of the most despised characters on US television as scheming, vicious Tiberius. More than 6 million

Bordering on doggy chaos

It sounds like the cast of a new canine movie: 101 Border Collies. TV vet and author Dr Katrina Warren is often surrounded at training displays by four or five of her favourite dog breed, with her border collie mates The Wonderdogs (pictured). Next Saturday she'll be hanging out with at least 200 — or maybe

"There are groups of people who have never met hooking up to do road-trip adventures together with their border collies. It is crazy, but a testament to how much people love their dogs."

Warren needs 101 border collies to break the record. "But I think we will easily double, possibly triple that," she says